Sometimes a scant allowance of food is the fault of the steward, who wishing to gain the favour of the ship owner, cuts the expense of the provision bill, thus robbing the sailor of what would otherwise be given him. And some captains take no trouble to inform themselves of the sailors condition, and as long as they are ready for duty and no complaints made, consider everything is satisfactory and pass with them.

It is not till the sailors are taken by the captain's order we were deprived of many of the luxuries common to sailors, that we were to go to sea in the old man, as the captain is termed by the little, tubes and are clogged with them.

When these are evicted your lungs cannot suffer, but when they are left in the chest it is cold, cough, or catarrh, consumption, or any of these, and more or less obstructions, all are brought on, and there is no getting rid of it, unless you are cured of the disease.
